

Secondary and Vocational Education of Home Children

The Home opened the Isidore Newman Manual Training School in October 1904 to educate its wards alongside children from the community whose parents paid tuition. Although all Home children from that date on began their education at Newman School, not all Home children remained there through high school graduation. In some cases, Home children reunited with family. In other cases, certain children were deemed ill-suited for the school's academic rigors or demonstrated an aptitude or expressed a preference for commercial or vocational training.

As detailed below, nearly 100 Home children graduated from Newman while others continued their high school education at New Orleans's public schools, including Joseph Kohn Commercial High School for Girls, Francis T. Nicholls Industrial School for Girls, Samuel J. Peters Commercial School for Boys, and Delgado Trades School. In addition, between 1898 and 1933, the Home sent twelve boys to the National Farm School in Doylestown, Pennsylvania, which Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf established to train Jewish boys in agriculture, animal breeding, and landscaping.

Where known, the following list also notes college attendance.
