Dear Uncle Harry,

after having been through the excited preparations and the ceremony itself, I realize that I neglected to send invitations to my wedding to some of those I had intentions to invite. You are one of them.

The best I can possibly do now is tell you about it so that my conscience will be a bit relieved. It was a very quiet but happy affair. Only my close relations and very close friends attended. The ceremony itself was a short one (which was to my liking) and dinner was served afterwards.

Put into such few words,
one would think that the preparations for a wedding was nothing at
all. But, gosh, I have been on the go for a month with my plans
and preparations.

Something which I did not expect and yet am very appreciative of is all the beautiful gifts I received. Everyone was very nice to me. (please understand that I am not being suggestive) As I only want you to know how kind everyone was to me.

My husband and I
are very happy. We think the world of each other. I am sure that you would enjoy meeting them as he is a boy of high character and that is a quality you admire.

There is nothing more

just now. If I could but hear from you, I would know that you understand that the unpardon-able sin of not inviting you was not done intentionally.

Gus sends his best
regards and I send my bestest to everyone (this includes every thing but my love as I reserve that for my husband)

Sincerely
